Bussa al cielo e ascolta il suono

Carla Viparelli

A triptych composed of three panels of the same height but different widths, painted in oil. The two lateral elements act as columns, almost like the entrance to a Greek temple. The pattern of parallel vertical stripes also harks back to ancient Greek culture, and in particular to the atomistic philosophy, first formulated by Democritus, who broke down matter into its indivisible first principles, the atoms, whose motion he saw as perpetually falling vertically and parallel. Epicurus enriched this rigid, imperturbable movement with a variant, the clinamen, that is, an unpredictable deviation from the parallelism of the falling atoms, a sudden vector of intersection and encounter, which allows things themselves to exist.

Sound lines up from above. Letters, like atoms, don't simply fall in parallel, but often meet and overlap, generating dense fields in which the sound itself seems to take shape and become an image, a hieroglyph, a sign, an island. This vision, or rather, this listening experience that opens the doors to the heavens, is dedicated to these islands of sound, these fields of solidified immateriality.
